General Grant. A British field officer, who recently visited the Army of the Potomac, gives the following personal description of

Gen. Grant : On presenting myself at headquar-ters, and delivering my letter of introduction for the Commander in Chief into the hands of the Adjutant General, lay, by Gen. Grant, who gave me a most cordial welcome, assigned me a tent next to his owr, and asked me to live with him during my stay. At six we dined in a plank hut, sitting down, ten in number, the whole party, with the exception of myself, belonging to the General's staff. The General is taciturn, which gives the cue to his party. He must certainly have enough on his to inform the public generally the special attention mind to occupy his thoughts, though will be given to the prosecution, adjustment and he does not show any signs of wear. In person, he bears a very strong likeness to the late Lord Charles Wellesley, with whom I was personally acquainted. Indeed, on coming out of my tent next morning, and seeing the General standing, eigar in mouth, in front of his, so striking was this resemblance in countenance, figure, and appearance, that had I not known the second son of the Duke of Wellington is no longer living, I could have almost sworn he stood before me. General Grant is Property or Supplies Purchased about forty-two years of age, and was regularly educated for the service at West Point, but finding promotion slow, he quitted the army, and had been for five years engaged in private pursuits when the civil war broke out. Touching Incident of the War. A correspondent of the Tribune, with General Sheridan's army, makes the following interesting notice of Sheridan's headquarters, and the death of Col. John Marshall, grandson of Chief For HORSES and EQUIPAGE LOST in the SER. Justice Marshall, in the fight of the 15th of November:

General Sheridan had made his headquarters at Bartonville, the venerable ountry seat, for more than a century Mr. Atkinson having had ten years experience as past, of the Bartons, who were formerly one of the most wealthy and aristocratic families of Winchester. The fine old stone mansion was originally built for a fort, and was long oc-Indians. Washington himself is said to have slept within its walls. It stands on the valley pike, facing westward, at the crossing of Opequan, and its massive walls, still bomb-proce though enlarged and surrounded with all that is ivy grown and venerable in an American family history. Its broad acres, now fenceless and wasted, and its beautiful lawn, now sered in the light of crowded camp-fires afford one of the saddest pictures of the desolation of war. A beautiful child now stands upon the porch, a girl of ten summers, rosy and bright, Fannie Marshall by name, great grand daughter of the distinguished Chief Justice of the United States. She clings to the hand of Maj General Sheridan, who listens to her prattle, and looks up inquiringly into his face as the sound of distant cannon come nearer to warn him he is needed General Sheridan is a good-looking nan, in spite of the wretched pictures of him which prevail, and by no means the brutal ruffian which he is represented to be, but a most genial, kind hearthearted, amiable man, with a face running over with smiles; and disposition full of humor and even boisterous good As he stoops to caress the fair child, the human for a moment evidently subdues the heroic, for he lingers at the parting as if he knew what the child probably does not, that her father (Col. John Marshall of the rebel army) is the gallant officer who so fiercely pressed forward the robel artillery, al ready within sight of his homestead.

and whom it is his duty to sweep from the very hearthstone of his family. On come the rebel troopers, evidently urged by more than ordinary seal and impetuosity. Charge follows charge and volley answers volley. Our bravest Centre Tables, are falling; the line wavers; even Custer is forced backward; and the rebel father rushes homeward to his wife and and gently caresses the child, and after ordering his headquarters more to the rear as the hostile cannon come nearer, with all the soldier again in his face he presses rapidly to the front. Alas for the sad fate of war, the presence of Sheridan is inevitable death and destruction to the enemy. He had scarcely reached the field ere the gallant Colonel Marshall is Blair meeting with success, that the con- known whether they were in the water slain at the head of his command, while bravely pressing forward immedistely in front of his homestead, and not three miles distant therefrom.
